Preface

This publication marks the end of an era — the passing of the Heroic Age of rescue archaeology in Britain. It was an age which began in 1938 when Brian O'Neil, Chief Inspector of Ancient Monuments, began to use Government funds to pay for archaeological excavations necessitated by a spate of military constructions in the run-up to the war, and ended in 1972, the year in which the first full-time professional archaeological units came into being. In that hectic, pioneering period of 35 years, during which the discipline of archaeology in Britain came of age, about a thousand rescue excavations were undertaken.

For the most part the work was carried out by directors hired for the duration of the excavation with little concern for how the results would be prepared for publication. If any thought was given to publication it was tacitly assumed that the director would write up the results in his or her own time, much as had been the case in the 1920s and 1930s. While some directors did, indeed, fulfil this expectation, many lacked the time, the resources, the energy, or the commitment to do so. The result was that as the 1970s progressed, and more and more rescue excavations had to be undertaken, we were all made only too painfully aware that the results of our predecessors' activities, needed to inform current decision-making, were, with a few notable exceptions, simply not being made available in published form.

To overcome this problem the Ancient Monuments Board set up a 'Backlog' programme, and it is greatly to the credit of its successor body, English Heritage, that the programme was not only continued but energetically brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

That we are now in a position to publish this list, recording such a high level of success, is entirely due to the continued commitment of English Heritage and to the dedicated efforts of a small team who have persuaded and cajoled reticent excavators to produce their archives and reports, and where that has not been possible, have found others who have been prepared to step in and help. The achievement of those pioneer excavators, who laboured with a minimum of support from 1938 to 1972, can now at last begin to be appreciated.

There are many lessons to be learnt from this exercise, not least the high cost, in resources and time, of the post-excavation work needed to prepare a report for publication. This is a lesson that must be fully appreciated and accepted by those who propose to undertake excavation and those who sponsor them. To embark upon an excavation is to assume a heavy responsibility. We must be grateful, indeed, that so many of the directors of rescue excavations, active in the period 1938–72, have been able and willing to honour their commitments to their profession.

Barry Cunliffe
Chairman
Backlog Working Party

Introduction

Government sponsorship of rescue archaeology became a recognised policy before the 1939–45 war. At that stage the threat came mainly from the construction of airfields, which involved the employment of the new mechanical earthmovers. After the war it was the building of new housing and factory estates, as well as the rebuilding of bombed areas, which made archaeological investigation necessary, compounded by the increase in the extraction of building materials, especially gravel. The next major perceived threat was the increasing mechanisation of agriculture, and especially the ploughing of classic upland areas of ancient settlement. In the 1960s the redevelopment of the centres of historic towns and the construction of motorways increased the destruction of archaeological sites.

The government department responsible for the sponsorship of rescue excavation changed its title several times during this period, beginning as the Office of Works and becoming in turn the Ministry of Works, the Ministry of Public Building and Works, and the Department of the Environment. However, the name of the body within each successive department which was concerned with this work remained constant: the professional officers of the Inspectorate of Ancient Monuments initiated policy, administered funding, and oversaw progress.

The Inspectorate's policy was, wherever possible, to arrange for excavation in advance of all these developments on all known archaeological sites. This was not limited to Scheduled Ancient Monuments.

For the earlier rescue excavations few detailed records survive. Administrative action and expenditure were recorded on the files of the various government departments which were successively responsible for funding, but many wartime files have been destroyed and later ones are often imprecise about details, especially location. Later on a number of projects were run by ad hoc committees. Most of these drew their funds from the Inspectorate, but a few, eg Verulamium, Chester, and Fishbourne, had substantial support from other sources. By the early 1970s the Department of the Environment sought to deal with the still-growing demand for 'rescue archaeology' by setting up permanent regional archaeological organisations which would draw funds from local authorities and developers as well as from central government. After 1972, therefore, the Inspectorate was no longer directly responsible for much of the work.

In the early stages excavations were carried out by freelance archaeologists and a few paid labourers. The archaeologists were paid a daily fee for the duration of the excavation itself, and were expected subsequently to prepare and publish the report of the excavation in their own time. With the increase in the scale and pace of development and the consequent numbers of excavations, particularly during the 1960s, more assistants were employed on site to supervise and record, and archaeologists tended to move quickly on to new projects before completing all stages of post-excavation and publication work on their previous projects.

By the time the need to pay for the substantial time and effort required for post-excavation work was recognised, a substantial 'backlog' of unpublished excavation had built up. This backlog, combined with the shortage of ancillary services (illustrators, conservators, and specialists, both archaeological and scientific), made it impossible to deal swiftly with the greatly increased quantities of finds and information which large-scale excavation was producing.

This problem was tackled in 1974. Separate funds were allocated to a new programme – which came to be known as the Backlog Programme – which had the aim of making publicly available the results of all government-funded excavations carried out before the end of 1972, the date which marked the end of the phase when the Inspectorate had the main responsibility. Staff in the newly created Backlog Publications section of the Inspectorate were made responsible for organising this programme. Excavators were asked to apply for the resources necessary to complete their reports, such as funds for the employment of specialists or assistants, allocations of time in the work programmes of the Ancient Monuments Laboratory and the Illustrators' Office, and grants for the final publication of their reports. Where excavators were unable to work up their material for publication, specialist consultants or substitute authors were commissioned.

In order to avoid an open-ended commitment, and because there was the need to release funds for post-1972 rescue excavation and post-excavation, limits were set to the availability of 'backlog' funds. A final five-year programme was announced in 1980, to run from 1981 to 1986.

In 1984 the Ancient Monuments Board (later the Ancient Monuments Advisory Committee) set up the Backlog Working Party under the chairmanship of Professor Barry Cunliffe. The Working Party's main brief was to consider the list of unpublished sites and to advise on priorities. A series of meetings was held at which archaeologists responsible for some of the most important unpublished excavations were asked to explain their difficulties; as far as possible the Inspectorate and the Ancient Monuments Laboratory attempted to provide the help recommended. Towards the end of the programme in 1986 English Heritage, which had become the responsible body, arranged for continuation of funding for those projects which the Working Party felt were of exceptional importance. For the remainder it was agreed that the aim should be to ensure the availability of all the records and finds, particularly those for sites which were likely to remain unpublished, by arranging for deposit in the appropriate museums and in the National Archaeological Record (NAR). Funding for these elements of the programme finally came to an end in March 1990, though publication grants were still available until March 1993.

Variations in the quality of record-keeping over the period make any quantification of rescue excavation 1938–72 and its publication only approximate, and the records give very little indication of archaeological value. The Inspectorate's records were administrative and not intended to indicate the archaeological value of the 'sites'. One site could be no more than a trial trench which yielded negative results, or several seasons of large-scale excavation with results of international importance. Equally, separate excavations on some major sites have sometimes been grouped to make a single publication, while other excavations carried out as one project, but involving different types of site, have been separated for publication. With this proviso, some indication of the scale of the work is given by the following figures: over 1100 sites were excavated; of these some 950 have been published or submitted for publication; reports are still expected from some 60 excavations; some 270 sites have had their records copied into the NAR (including some of the sites which have also been published); fewer than 20 can be said (in 1993) to have no clear resolution.

The archaeological value of the 1938–72 rescue programme must be assessed in the light of the excavation policies of the time. Excavation took place only in those areas of a site affected by the threat. Because of this, the work did not necessarily yield results of great academic interest, although much valuable information might be recorded. For such sites the availability of the records in a public archive is the main requirement. In addition, perceptions have altered about what could and should have been achieved in terms of the archaeological record. Some of the earlier excavations which were promptly published could have been given much fuller treatment had post-excavation work been carried out more recently.

A full assessment of the academic results of the programme would require a review of the many hundreds of substantial reports scattered through the national and county journals of the past 50 or so years. However, some indication of the results is given by considering the scope of the published monographs. They include the post-war and later campaigns in the country's major Roman and medieval towns: Canterbury, Chichester, Cirencester, Gloucester, and Winchester; the Neolithic ritual centres at Mount Pleasant and Staines; Staple Howe, Gussage, and Little Waltham Iron Age settlements; Anglo-Saxon communities at Bishopstone, Dover, West Stow, and Mucking; the unique Anglian centre at Yeavering; and the later Saxon palace at Cheddar. The growth of medieval and post-medieval archaeology is reflected in reports on sites such as Donyatt, Hereford, King's Lynn, Norwich, Nuneaton, Stamford, Thetford, and West Whelpington, while major contributions have been made to the study of more traditional subjects such as Roman villas: Gadebridge, Lullingstone, and Winterton.

The Backlog Programme resulted from an increasing awareness within the archaeological profession that there was little value in excavating large numbers of sites if the results of these excavations were to remain unavailable. It became widely accepted not only that funding needed to be concentrated on post-excavation efforts but also that more thought needed to be given to the effects of these investigations on the direction of research. In addition, it was recognised that future archaeological investigation needed a structure within which it could operate more effectively, in order to ensure that the investigation itself, its results, and the research initiatives generated could be approached in a coordinated way.

As a result English Heritage has published two documents which offer a structure and strategy for both the direction and the organisation of archaeological investigation. Exploring our past; strategies for the archaeology of England (1991) is a review of the achievements of the previous decade of funding, together with a strategy, born of the 1980s, for dealing with the problems and opportunities which will be encountered over the next decade. Management of archaeological projects (2nd edn 1991) sets out a formal project management procedure which is being applied in all archaeological projects funded by English Heritage and which, it is hoped, other organisations will use, interpret, and develop. The new approach embodied in these documents, coupled with the experience gained through the Backlog Programme, provides a sound basis for the better management of archaeological work in the future.

This volume is intended as a basic record of the Backlog Programme's achievements. The list which follows includes sites known to staff of the programme to have been excavated with government funding between 1938 and 1972; it may not be a full list because records of the early days are incomplete and because there were some sites which received a small amount of funding or assistance in kind, of which full details are not available. We have tried to be as comprehensive as possible.

List of sites

The list is arranged alphabetically by site name; alternative site names are listed with cross-references. Each entry lists the excavator(s) together with the dates of (government-funded) excavation and the archaeological period, followed by details of resulting publications and, where appropriate, of the NAR, or other, archive deposit. Where several different excavation campaigns have taken place on the same site, these are listed in chronological order. The counties are post-1974; a list of sites by county is given at the end of the volume.
